DevOps is not magic. It requires quite a lot of discipline. First of all, you have to focus on people first. Your people are going to build and implement a well defined process. Because the process is defined, you can build automation in support of it. The result of the automation is speed and efficiency.

You can do all this without ever having anyone in the organization with a title that includes the word "DevOps." You don't ever have to mention DevOps. However, you do need to get your people into a place where they can communicate with one another using shared terms and understanding. That allows you to define a process. Then, you can automate it. Lots of organizations start with automation.

They fail.

Don't fail. Start with the people. You'll get the efficiency and speed.
